PURIM: A LESSON IN USING OUR POWER FOR GOOD

Although Purim can seem, on the surface, like a purely fun-oriented holiday -- costumes, merriment, silliness, noisemakers -- there is more there than meets the eye. That is kind of Purim's theme, really. In the Book of Esther, things aren't necessarily as they first appear. The king isn't really in charge; Esther isn't just a beautiful woman; and though God is never mentioned, divine providence is palpably present, subtly guiding events to turn out for the best.

There are a few interesting things about this particular Megillah -- for instance, the fact that the first line ends with the word המלך/ha-melech (the king) and then in the next ten or so columns the first line begins with that same word, again and again. The king. The king. The king.

Clearly this text has something to say to us about the king. Who's the king? Obviously the king is Achashverosh, right? The first line of the text says so plainly. Of course, Achashverosh doesn't seem very bright. He's clearly ruled by his own carnal appetites; first with Vashti, then the two times when he, er, raises his scepter to Esther his new queen. He can't make a single decision without an advisor there to tell him what to do, and toward the end of the story he admits that he can't annul a single one of his own decrees. Some king.

This story is filled with hints of another kind of power. The power that caused Esther to be placed in a position where she might save her people. The power to which the righteous Mordechai would bow though the text tells us that Mordechai "bows to no man." The kind of power that would avert the severity of an evil decree and enact righteousness and compassion in its place. But that power, that form of kingship, is never mentioned.

Purim reveals to us that in the corrupting influence of power, we lose perhaps the strongest, most reliable source of meaning and happiness in life: numerous studies have found that empathy, compassion, gratitude, and elevation and the acts of altruism they inspire, are powerful determinants of enduring happiness and good health.

In Purim's world of smoke and mirrors, and cloaks of deception - Queen Esther is more than she claims to be, the gallows on which Haman intends to hang Mordechai becomes his own undoing, and the true king in the story is never mentioned at all. Through their journey we learn that when we direct our attention solely to our own desires and ambitions, feelings of power actually undermine our own self-interest.

Ultimately, the Jews of Shushan find their own redemption through the wisdom and faith of Mordechai, the fasting of Esther and the people, and then the new decree she convinces the king to sign. Yes, God is involved -- but God is hidden, never mentioned by name. In that sense, Purim is a great celebration of human agency. Perhaps that is why the sages of Jewish tradition suggest that in HaOlam HaBa (the world to come), when creation is redeemed, all other festivals will fall away but Purim will remain because it celebrates our ability to reshape the future with our own hands.

As we listen to the Megillah this year, may Mordechai and Esther teach us how to use the power we have, not for selfish gains, but to help transform our lives and the lives of others for the better.

YOUTH

◀ In Review - YFTI Ski Trip: Our annual Ski/Winter Trip was a great time for all! We had tons of fun together at the Great Wolf Lodge where our teens led beautiful services and meaningful programs for one another. On Saturday, we headed to Crystal Mountain where we hit the slopes all day! After an exhausting day, we all met back up at Great Wolf Lodge for a special Havdalah and time together at the waterpark. Finishing on Sunday morning with some crazy fun snow tubing, by the time we all got on the bus back home, we were all exhausted! The weekend wouldn't have been possible without the hard work of all our teen leaders, who created an incredible weekend of fun!

◀ In Review - YFTI Mystery Night: On Saturday night, February 11, our teens boarded a bus not knowing what they were getting themselves into. ▲ In Review - Temple Israel Sisterhood hosts an Interfaith Women's Freedom Seder: On April 5, 2016 Temple Israel Sisterhood hosted its first ever Women's Freedom Seder that underscored human trafficking as the modern day form of slavery. About 85 women from Temple Israel in West Bloomfield along with women from Hartford Memorial Baptist Church in Detroit who came as our guests, attended and participated in this social action Passover Seder. Rabbi Marla Hornsten and Rabbi Arianna Gordon conducted the Seder and the Sisterhood's Social Action Committee organized the event. The four cups of wine became social action oriented – cups of awareness, human dignity, hope and action. We watched a DVD that told the story of Theresa Flores, who was sexually trafficked as a 15-year-old attending Groves High School in Birmingham, MI and many years later started S.O.A.P (Save Our Adolescents from Prostitution), an initiative that provides bars of soap to be labeled with the national human trafficking hotline number and placed in motels. Donations were made to S.O.A.P and to Atzum (a social justice agency that helps human trafficking victims in Israel). It was a wonderfully powerful Seder that touched everyone that attended.

New Yahrzeit Board

Temple Israel is proud to announce a beautiful new way to observe the yahrzeits of your loved ones!

Through the generosity of Judith and Dr. Max Robins, a new yahrzeit board has been installed in the alcove between the chapel and the coat room.

All of the names on the plaques in the sanctuary are already loaded into the new system. During the week, you can search for your loved ones on the interactive screen. On Shabbat, the screen locks, honoring and remembering only those being observed on that day. The exciting feature of the new board is that photos and biographies can be added to create a meaningful legacy profile for your loved ones. If you have a plaque in the sanctuary, start deciding on a maximum of three photos and begin writing a biography for your relatives. Information on how to submit the photos and biography will be announced soon!
