PARSHA MATTERS - by Rabbi Sam Taylor

Moshe's father-in-law Yitro joins the Children of Israel at Mount Sinai. The Torah then relates that Moshe told his father-in-law about the many miraculous events which took place during the Exodus from Egypt and Yitro reacted with great excitement, 'vayichad Yitro' which means 'and Yitro rejoiced'.

Whereas the plain meaning of the word vayichad is joy and elation, the Talmud in Sanhedrin cites two other interpretations of this word, both of which associate vayichad with the Hebrew word for chad which means sharp. According to one view, vayichad means that Yitro ran a sharp knife over his flesh, that is, he underwent circumcision as part of his formal conversion process. The other interpretation is that Yitro's flesh became prickly, a reference to the pain he experienced upon hearing of the suffering of the Egyptians, a people with whom he had previously been affiliated.

Interestingly, both these interpretations of vayichad speak of an experience of pain and discomfort, which is the precise opposite of the plain meaning of the word. One view understands vayichad as a description of physical pain, and the other as referring to emotional pain, but both explain that the Torah describes Yitro going through an uncomfortable experience during his reunion with Moshe.

The message that emerges from this passage is that joy does not necessitate the complete absence of discomfort, and that one can experience true joy even while enduring a degree of physical or emotional pain. The Torah here clearly tells us that Yitro rejoiced, and our Sages want us to realise that Yitro experienced immense and sincere joy, even as he endured the physical pain of circumcision and the emotional pain of hearing of the Egyptians suffering.

We must remember that joy must not be dependent on the absence of all pain and discomfort. Sometimes we endure pain of one kind or another, and many times we make the mistake of thinking that we cannot experience joy until it passes. The Gemara's interpretations of vayichad remind us that we can find joy even in these situations, that we are always capable of rejoicing over G-d's blessings.
