PARSHA MATTERS - by Rabbi Sam Taylor

The Torah presents the law of ba bemachteret, which relates an intruder who is challenged by the homeowner. In such a case, the owner is authorised to kill the intruder, as there is good reason to believe that the intruder broke into the home knowing full well that he would be confronted by the owner, and is prepared to kill him. As such, every intrusion is treated as life threatening, and the homeowner may kill to protect himself.

Interestingly, the Gemara in Sanhedrin draws a difference between different types of intrusions. The Torah speaks specifically of a ba bemachteret, a burglar who digs a tunnel into the victim's home. The Gemara notes that if the intruder comes in through less strenuous means such as through a door or window, the homeowner does not have the right to kill him unless he first warns the burglar that he would kill him if he does not leave.

Rashi explains that in such a case, we cannot assume that the burglar intends to kill the homeowner. It is possible that he found an open door or window and believed he could attempt a burglary and then flee if he is noticed. If however, the burglar went through the trouble of digging a passageway into the home, we can assume that he is committed to robbing the home at all costs, even if this requires murder.

Underlying the Gemara's ruling is a concept that applies to virtue as much as it does to crime. If a person is not truly committed to a cause, then he might participate when he finds an open door, if he sees a convenient opportunity. But if one is passionately devoted to a goal, he is prepared to dig and do what is necessary to achieve it. Even when the windows are locked and there is no easy path to the goal, he invests the effort needed to get there. Rather than waiting to notice an open window in our spiritual lives, we should pursue excellence even if this demands unconditional commitment and consistent effort. This is our sacred responsibility.
