PARSHA MATTERS - by Rabbi Sam Taylor

The mitzvah of bikkurim required a farmer to bring the first fruits of his orchard that ripen to the Beit Hamikdash, where he gave the fruit to the Kohen and made a special declaration. The Mishnayot in Masechet Bikkurim describe the extraordinary fanfare, which accompanied the procession of people making their way to Jerusalem with their bikkurim. The farmers were given special honour and distinction, as various groups of dignitaries made a point of coming to greet them as they entered Jerusalem, and all the artisans in the city would stop their work when the procession passed by in order to extend a warm welcome.

The Chassidic Master Rabbi Yerachmiel Yisrael Yitzchak Danciger of Alexander, saw in this special greeting to the farmers an expression of the immense value and worth of each and every mitzvah a person performs. The dignitaries and artisans of Jerusalem stopped what they were doing in order to show respect to simple farmers, who did nothing other than designate a small amount of their crop as bikkurim, and then bring them to Jerusalem. These were not learned scholars, distinguished leadership figures, or wealthy philanthropists making a generous contribution to the Beit Hamikdash. They did something fairly simple and unexceptional, and this is precisely why, the Rebbe of Alexander explains, they were given such honour and distinction. This was done to show them, and all of us, that even a seemingly simple mitzvah act is precious and worthy of respect.

One may also apply this concept to shape our perspective on the annual process of introspection and teshuva which we undergo in Elul. It is easy to view this process cynically, in light of our previous experiences which do not seem to have yielded visibly significant results. Year in and year out, we recite the same special prayers and hear or read about the need for change, but many of us fail to see any change in ourselves. The Rebbe of Alexander here urges us to never underestimate the value and importance of even the slightest bit of effort invested in the service of G-d, and this includes effort invested in the lofty enterprise of self improvement. If we are sincere in our attempt to grow and improve, then we have done something precious and valuable. We must therefore not belittle any effort we've made in the past or are doing in the present, because every small step we take is immensely meaningful.
