PARSHA MATTERS - by Rabbi Taylor

The Torah describes the prophetic vision that Yaakov had as he slept during his journey to Charan. Yaakov saw a ladder extending from the ground to the heavens and angels climbing up and down the ladder. Upon awakening, he exclaimed that the site where he had slept was 'the house of G-d' and 'the gateway to the heavens', as evidenced by the ladder which connected heaven and earth at that spot. Yaakov then named the place where he slept Beit El, the house of the Almighty and the Torah makes a point of mentioning that the area was previously known as Luz.

Rabbi Menachem Bentzion Sacks, writes that the significance of the shift from the name Luz to Beit El may perhaps be understood in light of the Gemara's description of a city built later that was also called Luz. The Gemara in Sota 46b tells us that it was a unique city and that the angel of death did not have permission to pass through it, such that its inhabitants were protected from death. But the elders within it at the time, when they were exasperated or frustrated with life would go outside the wall and die. The people did not die in the city and so when people grew old and no longer wished to live they would then go outside the city. Rabbi Sacks explains that the Gemara here depicts the tragic phenomenon of people who strive to prolong their lives, but fail to find meaning and fulfillment. There are people who work very hard to protect themselves from the angel of death, to live long lives, but they eventually find themselves in a condition of discontentment and fatigue, which leads them to wish for death.

Rabbi Sacks thus suggests that the renaming of Luz as Beit El indicates to us that the way we avoid the phenomenon of Luz, of long but unfulfilling lives, is through Yaakov's dream in Beit El, which symbolises the merging of heaven and earth. Alongside our efforts to maintain our health and prolong our lives, we must also strive to connect with G-d as symbolized by the ladder extending from the ground to the heavens. We must try to live here on earth with our minds reaching towards the heavens, striving each day to strengthen our relationship with the Almighty and thereby make each and every day meaningful and fulfilling.
