TORAH THOUGHT:

Noach: The Tower of Babel

Howard Sragow did graduate work in Ancient Jewish History at the Bernard Revel Graduate School of Yeshiva University before pursuing a career in health care technology. You can find him early most mornings practicing Toradojo martial arts in the Redwood School parking lot.

The Tower of Babel is taught to very young children. It's a simple story with just nine verses, 121 Hebrew words. It answers the conundrum of how humans could descend from a common ancestor, yet speak unfamiliar languages. Yet its simplicity hides a subtle art that makes the story even more compelling upon a second read.

This story is useful for studying the Torah's narrative art because it is mostly independent. Most stories in the Torah have connections that reach forward and backward through the larger narrative. But these nine verses have no recurring characters. Earlier chapters don't explicitly anticipate its events. It appears to be a mostly self-contained microcosm, with a clear beginning and end. It seems valid to analyze it as a unit.

The Dutch scholar Jan Fokkelman did so in 1975. And he demonstrated that this small story has an unusual structure. Certain motifs repeat: the phrase "kol haaretz" (the entire earth) – occurs in verses 1, 4 and 9. The word "safah" (language) occurs five times; the verb "hefitz" (scatter) occurs in verses 4, 8 and 9. And the word "havah" (let's) occurs in verses 4 and 7. Word repetitions in Torah narrative often highlight ironic contrast (compare Joseph's interpretation of the baker's dream, which starts exactly like his interpretation of the butler's dream, but ends violently); the repetitions here are no exception.

And the story's perspective shifts: the first four verses describe human action; and the last four verses describe Divine action. But the fifth verse, exactly in the middle, contains a transition: G-d came down in order to see the city. This is one reason Fokkelman describes the structure as having chiastic symmetry: four verses at the beginning with a "down" perspective (the people acting on earth), four verses at the end with an "up" perspective (G-d acting in heaven), and one verse in the middle which bridges from the "down" part to the "up" part.

Repetition of the word "havah" provides another key chiastic point, taking place once in the people's ideation "let's build a city" and once in G-d's hortatory "let's go down." When a word is repeated, it makes a listener focus briefly on their prior experience of the word. The listener is likely to remember: "The last time I heard that word, the people were speaking, and they were intending to make sure the people wouldn't be scattered." A careful listener is likely to anticipate that G-d is going to act against the people's intent.

The larger phrase "scattered over the entire earth" also provides a key chiastic point, since it is found at the end of both sections, in verses 4 and 9. The first time, "scattered over the entire earth" is what the people seek to avoid; they build the city and tower so that they can stay together. But the second time, "scattered over the entire earth" is what G-d does to the people. The people tried to accomplish a goal, and in pursuing that goal, they thwarted it. The story implies an irony: had the people been less industrious, lazed around and not built a city instead of trying to avoid being scattered, they actually might have achieved their goal and stayed together.

The sequential listener would also hear in the sixth verse allusion to a phrase found earlier in Genesis: "hen echad" (behold, one). The last time we'd heard that, G-d was taking proactive action against a rebellious Adam: "Hen adam haya k'echad mimenu" (the man is going to be one like us). This recognition forces G-d to take initiative and banish Adam from the Garden of Eden before he can consume from the Tree of Life. Similarly here, man desires to be just a bit too similar to G-d; as a result, G-d must subvert the people's goals, and prevent them from being "echad." A careful listener would hear those foreboding implications immediately upon hearing the word "hen," and certainly upon hearing "hen am echad."

The chiastic structure of the story also reflects the G-dly ethic of "midda k'neged midda" (measure for measure). Just as the story's verse structure is symmetric, so is G-d's justice symmetric too. The people tried to rebel against G-d's planned dispersion by building towards G-d's heavenly domain; G-d therefore prevented them from continuing to build the city, and scattered them.

I hope this brief analysis inspires you to read the Torah more carefully. Just when you think you know it, a new perspective can cause you to see even more. Shabbat Shalom.

Over the course of the next few months, we will have different people write a D'var Torah for the newsletter. The goal is to hear words of Torah from other Ohr Torah members and learn a little about who they are. I encourage everyone to participate. Please email me at Rabbi@congregationohrtorah.org if you would like to volunteer to share your ideas with us. Torah unites our nation. We are really excited about this project and I hope it will strengthen our bonds as a community.
