Dvar Torah: Parshat Noach

"D'var Torah for Parashat Noach
by Harry Rothstein

Did you know that canines have a sense of humor and that elephants perform a short funeral for their deceased and that an elephant will paint a self-portrait if given the correct tools? We share some sentient sensibilities with other species such as humor, grief, reverence for the deceased and a sense of how our bodies appear to others. As humans, we share additional human awareness and traits with other human beings.

Our shared Jewish faith is balanced between a strong universalism which demands moral behavior of all humans and an equally strong particularism found in the 613 mitzvot. The 613 mitzvot are directed only to the Jewish people, while the biblical prophets sometimes reflect a deep concern for all humanity. The Torah also reflects a moral concern for all human beings, as in Bereishet 9:1-7, which is the root of the Sheva Mitzvot of Noach.

The question that Bereishet 9:1-7 in parashat Noach attempts to answer is indeed what benevolent traits do we Jews expect of non-Jews as individual human beings, cultures, nations, and civilizations? The laws of B'nei Noach as expressed in Bereishet 9:1-7 include the commandment to reproduce, to eat both meat and vegetation, not to eat the flesh of a still-living creature, and not to commit suicide or murder another human being. The Talmud expands the laws of B'nai Noach into the Sheva Mitzvot of B'nai Noach to include prohibitions against idolatry, blasphemy, murder, sexual sins, theft, and lastly, a commandment to establish courts of justice.

In my opinion, the Sheva Mitzvot can be seen to reflect basic human sensibilities that all humans may share. While the prohibition against idolatry is solely not to worship an image, there is here a hint of a basic understanding of the unity of the universe suggested by all monotheistic faiths and by today's modern science. This unity is to be both respected and revered and is a unity that points to the One. The prohibition against murder, held by any belief system I know, demands a basic respect for human life. The prohibition against sexual sin demands respect for the physical boundaries of others and to hold the physical being of others in due regard. The prohibition against theft demands respect for the property of others. To refrain from eating a living animal demands that we can be keenly aware of the dignity of other species. And the human sensibility that demands courts of justice is rooted in a basic human need to right wrongs foisted upon us and upon others. We all share in a basic humanity.

I would like to suggest that the Sheva Mitzvot of B'nai Noach indirectly suggest the possibility of a deeper common and universal human inner experience. As a hospital chaplain for many years, I have come to believe that all humans are meaning-making creatures. All of us seek out the meaning of our lives and our place in the universe through family relationships, livelihoods, personal tasks, sports, personal achievements, and many forms of faith. In Judaism, we especially find meaning in the study of texts we deem to be sacred. We share this basic task to find meaning in our lives with all of humanity.

We live in a world riven with strife and mistrust. If we come to truly accept the common humanity that we all share with others, even with others we dislike or with whom we perhaps violently disagree; we can then begin to internalize seeing things through their eyes or walking in their shoes. G-d willing we may come to share the common humanity suggested by the Sheva Mitzvot of B'nai Noach.
