PARSHAT MISHPATIM• 24 SHEVAT 5774 • JANUARY 24-25 2014

BY: BARRY YOUNGERMAN

They Ate and Drank

Israel's acceptance of the Torah at Sinai was a process that took place over time and not in a miraculous moment. After Moses begins teaching the people they are moved by awe and enthusiasm to declare: "All the things that the Lord has commanded we will do" [Shemot, 24:3, JPS], but we know that they soon found this blanket promise very difficult to fulfill. With the golden calf the people of Israel would soon violate even the simple commandments God had already conveyed, let alone the elaborate laws Moses would convey when he returned to the mountain some forty days later.

It took a generation of wandering in the wilderness for the people to acquire enough trust in Hashem, knowledge of Torah, and self-discipline to be worthy of entering the Land of Israel. The remainder of the Torah details this process.

The first practical steps toward accepting the yoke of Torah appear in this week's parsha. After the people proclaimed their acceptance Moses "wrote down all the commands of the Lord." He then built an altar at the foot of the mountain and at his order bulls were sacrificed. Moses read to the people the commandments he had written down. When they reaffirmed their verbal commitment he sprinkled the sacrificial blood on them, saying, "this is the blood of the covenant that the Lord now makes with you."

At this juncture the Torah does not mention what became of the meat of the sacrifice. Instead, it describes a strange event: "Then Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel ascended; and they saw the God of Israel: under His feet there was the likeness of a pavement of sapphire, like the very sky for purity. Yet He did not raise His hand against the leaders of the Israelites; they beheld God, and they ate and drank." [Shemot 24:9-11]

The last phrase seemed incongruous to many of the commentators. God granted an extraordinary, rich, evocative, and puzzling vision, not just to an individual, but to Aharon, his sons, and the seventy elders. Such a direct contact with God can be terrifying and dangerous to mind and body, but in this case God explicitly refrained from "raising his hand" against those who had the vision. How did the leaders respond to this unprecedented privilege? They ate and drank.

Some of the commentators criticize the elders for this behavior, which they find embarrassing. Others interpret the food allegorically-the vision gave them sustenance and refreshed their souls. By contrast the Ramban writes that the leaders were eating the sacrifices that had been made at the altar at the bottom on the mountain, to celebrate receiving the Torah. Others view the meal as a final step in making the covenant with God.

Eating and drinking are physical acts that give us pleasure and satisfaction. Like other earthly pleasures they are given holiness in our tradition. Food must be prepared and consumed mindfully, and when it is, it can add to our appreciation of our covenant with God.

The "kiddushes" that our shul offers after shabbat morning services should be seen in this context as well. Even if we do not wash and make it our second Shabbat "seudat mitzvah", it is a communal act that can bring us together before leaving the shul for our homes.

We have just heard the written torah read from the bimah, and heard words of Torah from the Rabbi, and we have just connected with Hashem through prayer and song-- or did our best to try. Like the seventy elders, we are now ready to seal the covenant. We sanctify the wine, and then-- we eat and drink.

It is easy enough to joke about our behavior at kiddush, and so we do. Far be it from me to detract from the humor, or to give musar about proper etiquette. We need not apologize for enjoying a nice oily piece of herring, or even for denigrating the cholent with a wave of the hand. But it is good to remember that we are also sharing in the holiness of kiddush and in a communal meal, or at least a communal nasch that can put a pleasant seal on our ever-renewing covenant with Hashem.
