The Power of Habit by Rabbi Jarrod Grover

If you think about it, the flood in Parashat Noah was not the most efficient way to destroy the world. Noah and his family spent 120 years building the ark in which they and the animals would survive. Even once the flood started, there were days of significant, but not necessarily destructive rain. The purpose of this drawn-out process was to spur people to repair their morally degenerate ways that had necessitated the destruction of the world.

For 120 years an otherwise very sane man has been publicly warning of impending disaster. Then, exactly in line with his prediction, the torrential downpour starts and continues unabated for 40 days. Amazingly not a single person got the message and resolved to change. Such is the destructive power of habit.

We tend to become so entrenched in our habits that we become totally desensitized to how those habits may be harming us or undermining our greater goals in life. This is true both physically and spiritually. Most teen smokers, for instance, never dream they'll one day find themselves slaves to their habit. Yet the slow, incremental increase soon becomes an entrenched part of a person's life until it seems totally normal for them to be in such a situation.

Being bound by our behavioral habits may all sound negative and inhibiting, but if utilized correctly, can be a tremendous source of positive growth. In the very same way that we can become accustomed to negative outlooks and actions, we can also become accustomed to positive outlooks and actions. Today's uphill battle can easily become tomorrow's norm.

The failure of the generation of the flood provides a crucial lesson for own growth and development. The fact that something has always been is no reason to assume it should continue to be. In the same way that successful businesses are open to change when necessary and take the appropriate measures to make that change, so too must we, on an individual level, be receptive to change as a means to growing into the most effective people we can be.

HAVE TO SAY ABOUT THE HOLINESS
OF THE LAND OF ISRAEL?

IN-PERSON & ON ZOOM

MONDAY MORNINGS FROM 9:45AM - 11:00AM
BEGINNING OCTOBER 31, 2022

The idea that the land of Israel retains a privileged status irrespective of the contemporary Jewish presence on it is one that has coursed through Jewish thought throughout the ages and was a powerful motivator for many modern Jews to return to their ancient homeland even if they had never laid eyes on any part of the Middle East prior to arrival.

In this class, we will explore the roots of the promise of landed Jewish sovereignty. Is the notion of the enduring sanctity of the land of Israel permanent, or subject to expiration? Is the land of Israel an important historical site? Or is it an enduring sacred space that constantly beckons the Jewish people to return to it even when they have left it for a long time?

THE LAST TRAIN
A HOLOCAUST STORY
BY RONA ARATO

On April 13, 1945, two tank commanders from the U.S. 30th Infantry came upon a stalled train outside the German village of Farlesleben. It was filled with 2,500 prisoners from the Bergen Belsen concentration camp. Their German guards had run off.

Rona Arato is a long-standing member of Beth Tikvah and an author of over 20 children's books. Her book The Last Train, a Holocaust Story is based on her husband's testimony of his liberation from the Farlesleben train.
