A great Rabbi was once asked, “Given that everything in creation has a purpose, what would be the purpose that there exists an ideology of not believing in G-d?” He answered that when a needy person asks for help, or a Torah institution is asking you for financial support, one should not rely on the belief that G-d will certainly provide for that person or institution. Rather, this is the time to be skeptical and to assume G-d will not help him; therefore, one has to do everything in one's power to help him. This is one instance when one should not trust in G-d, and the individual should take the necessary action.
