The Weekly Parsha

Parshas Toldos By Rabbi Ozer Alport

“And it came to pass, when Yitzchak had become old, and his eyes dimmed from seeing” (27:1)

The Torah records that Yitzchok was blind at the end of his life, which enabled Yaakov to deceive him to receive the blessings that were intended for Eisav. Rashi explains that Yitzchok suffered so much from the wicked, idolatrous practices of Eisav’s wives that he lost his vision. If so, why didn’t their actions have the same effect on Rivkah? The Medrash explains that Rivkah wasn’t impacted as intensely because she was accustomed to seeing idolatry in her father’s house.

The Hadar Z’keinim points out that this Medrash is difficult to understand. The Gemora in Kesuvos (20b) rules that a witness is only permitted to testify about an event for up to 60 years after witnessing it. After that time his testimony is not accepted, since he is presumed to have forgotten the event. Since Rivkah was married for 20 years before having children and Eisav got married when he was 40 (26:34), 60 years had passed since Rivkah left her father’s idolatrous house. Shouldn’t she have forgotten it by now and been equally affected by the wicked actions of her daughters-in-law?

Rav Benzion Brook answers that although a person may no longer consciously remember an event after 60 years have passed, its imprint will remain with him eternally. Even though Rivkah left her father’s house at the tender age of 3, the spiritual impact of her surroundings was permanently etched upon her soul. It was for this reason that Eliezer was so adamant that she return with him immediately, instead of remaining in her parents’ house for another year as was suggested (24:55-56). Eliezer recognized the damage which was being done to Rivkah’s lofty soul on a daily basis, and he insisted that she leave at once to prevent additional, irreparable harm from being done.

Rav Henoch Leibowitz points out that this is even more remarkable in light of the fact that Rivkah rebelled against everything her father stood for. She presumably hated idolatry even more than Yitzchok, for she had been exposed to it and rejected it. We may derive from here that even when one is fighting against negative environs and surroundings, he is nevertheless affected and pulled down by them. This lesson should highlight for us the importance of considering and monitoring the influences to which we allow ourselves and our children to be exposed.

That Very Red Stuff

Toward the end of Parshas Chaye Sarah, the Torah informs us that at the age of 175 years old, “Avraham expired and died at a good old age, an old man and content, and he was brought in to his people. His sons Yitzchak and Yishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah” (Bereishis 25:8-9). Rashi states that Avraham died five years earlier than was preordained, “so he should not see his grandson Esav depart for bad ways, for that would not be the ‘good old age’ that the Holy One, Blessed is He, had promised him.” Further on in the chapter, in Parshas Toldos, the Torah states: “And Yaakov boiled a stew, and Esav came in from the field, and he was exhausted. Esav said to Yaakov, ‘Pour into me, now, some of that very red stuff for I am exhausted.’ (He therefore called his name Edom.) Yaakov said, ‘Sell, as this day, your birthright to me.’ And Esav said, ‘Look, I am going to die, so of what use to me is a birthright?’ Yaakov said, ‘Swear to me as this day’; he swore to him and sold his birthright to Yaakov. Yaakov gave Esav bread and lentil stew, and he ate and drank, got up and left; and Esav spurned the birthright” (ibid. 25:29-34).

Rashi comments that “that very red stuff” was red lentils, a “mourner’s stew” prepared by Yaakov for his father Yitzchak, on the day that Avraham died. Rashi notes that Esav was “exhausted” from murdering, as the Midrash states that Esav had just returned from murdering Nimrod (the son of the Nimrod who threw Avraham into the furnace at Ur Kasdim; this Nimrod, who is identified as Amraphel, was killed by Avraham during the “War of the Kings” in Parshas Lech Lecha) and two of his guards, as he stole Nimrod’s special garments that Hashem made for Adam, and somehow made their way into the possession of Nimrod’s son. While the rest of the world’s dignitaries stood in the mourner’s row and lamented, “Woe to the world that has lost its leader; woe to the ship that has lost its pilot!” (Bava Basra 91b), Esav was busy hunting and plundering, and even murdering, oblivious to the sadness of the day, and uninvolved in his family’s bereavement.

To make matters worse for himself, Esav carelessly and impulsively forfeits his firstborn status and birthright for a bowl of “that very red stuff.” Rashi teaches that Esav actually feared the birthright because of the sacrificial duties that were associated with it. He thought he would very likely die as a result of performing these duties improperly, since some such breeches are punishable by death. The Ramban suggests that as a hunter, Esav was subject to constant danger and could not expect to live a long life. Either way, Esav did not value the birthright, and was perfectly content to trade it for a bowl of lentil stew. With this jaded, purely physical mindset on death, he nonchalantly says, “Look, I am going to die, so what use to me is a birthright?” (Bereishis 25:32).

The Malbim writes: “The concept of the birthright was that the firstborn be separated for Divine service, while the other brothers would engage in mundane worldly matters. Furthermore, per the Ran, upon the firstborn was incumbent managing the estate and seeing to all the needs of the father and mother, and the members of the household. Yaakov’s desire for the birthright was not motivated by honor, nor in order to inherit the double portion to which the firstborn is entitled. Rather, Yaakov desired the birthright for its spiritual aspect, the divine blessings of the soul that accompanied it, as well as the inheritance of the Holy Land. Yaakov saw how unfit Esav was for these things, and he therefore desired them for himself.” Esav was “a man who knows trapping, a man of the field” (ibid. 25:27), and had no interest in the spiritual rewards that came with the firstborn birthright. Yaakov, on the other hand, was “a wholesome man, abiding in tents (of Torah study)” (ibid. 25:27), and appreciated the great privilege and responsibility that accompanied the birthright, and understood the dangers involved had it remained in the hands of the wicked Esav.

This episode ends with “Yaakov gave Esav bread and lentil stew, and he ate and drank, got up and left; and Esav spurned the birthright” (ibid. 25:34). The Malbim concludes: “Even after eating and drinking his fill, Esav disdained the birthright. With this, the Torah informs us that Esav did not sell the birthright out of hunger, nor out of desire for this particular food; for if that had been the case, then he would have regretted his decision immediately after he ate and drank, and his cravings were satisfied. Rather, the birthright was something that Esav regarded as a worthless burden, and he was only too glad to have Yaakov take it off his hands.” It was not that Yaakov had outwitted Esav, as Esav later suggests after losing the bracha from his father Yitzchak (ibid. 27:36), rather Esav willingly gave up the birthright, something that he deemed pointless, for a mere bowl of “that very red stuff.” A gutten Shabbos.
