Weekly Parsha*Parshas Chukas

By Rabbi Ozer Alport

“Come to Cheshbon – let it be built and established as the city of Sichon” (21:27)

On a literal level, our cumbersome verse discusses the battles between two of the non-Jewish nations who lived at this time and commemorates the victory of one over the other. However, the Gemara (Bava Basra 78b) homiletically reinterprets our verse as teaching an important lesson in priorities.

The Gemara explains that the verse can be read as quoting not rulers over kingdoms, but rather rulers over their own base instincts and evil inclinations. What is the message of these masters of self-control? They advise that a person make a reckoning of the reward for performing a mitzvah versus the loss incurred by doing so, and the potential gain from sinning relative to its downside. The Gemara concludes that these individuals promise that somebody who makes the appropriate calculation will be built in this world and well-established in the World to Come.

The Mesillas Yesharim (Chapter 3) elucidates the Gemara’s explanation by way of a parable. For entertainment, many medieval rulers designed gardens in the form of mazes, with the tall trees constituting the walls. There were numerous paths through the maze, but all of them ended in dead-ends except for one, which led to the ruler’s villa in the center. From the elevated villa, the ruler was amused as he watched people continually getting lost in their attempts to reach their destination.

As all of the paths appeared identical, the only way that one could successfully navigate the maze other than trial-and-error was to ask somebody who had already reached the center and could see the entire maze from above and guide him through it. A person who is fortunate enough to receive advice from somebody who sees the entire maze beneath him would be foolish to ignore it.

Similarly, those people who have yet to conquer their yetzer haras are lost among the deceiving paths in this world. Their only hope to quickly locate the correct route to the goal is to ask the rulers who have already found it. The Gemara teaches that they advise us that the key to successfully navigating the maze and conquering the evil inclination is to make the aforementioned reckoning.

Rav Bentzion Brook questions the comparison of the Mesillas Yesharim. In the case that he discusses, those who have reached the center of the maze offer concrete advice to the people who are still lost inside, telling them where to turn and in which direction. In the Gemara’s case, however, the rulers over their inclinations offer no material suggestions for exiting the maze other than telling a person to ponder the situation. If somebody in dire financial straits approaches his friend for assistance, of what benefit would the friend be if he merely nodded his head and advised, “You should go think about it?”

Rav Brook answers that in comparing the two cases, the Mesillas Yesharim is teaching us a valuable lesson. Why don’t those who have successfully navigated the maze of this world and vanquished their evil inclinations give concrete advice analogous to those who are overlooking the garden maze, such as “Turn right” or “Go straight?” The answer is that while those directions are necessary to find the correct path through the garden maze, all that is necessary to defeat the yetzer hara is to stop and think.

As the Mesillas Yesharim writes earlier, the evil inclination’s modus operandi is to keep a person so busy and distracted that he doesn’t have time to properly contemplate the decisions that he makes in life. Without proper analysis, the yetzer hara is able to convince a person to sin and remain lost in its seemingly complex maze. However, if a person will listen to the advice of those who have won the battle and simply step back to ponder the potential gains and losses he faces as a result of his decisions, the façade of the complicated labyrinth will disappear and he will reach his goal in no time!

A Divine Kiss

This week’s parsha, Chukas, records the sorrowful deaths of both Miriam and Aharon. In the fortieth year in the midbar, Miriam passed on the tenth of Nissan at the age of 125; Aharon, four months later on the first of Av, at the age of 123. The Midrash states that both Miriam and Aharon died by misas neshika, a Divine kiss; as they each departed, their souls became united with the Shechinah directly through G-d, without the intervention of the Angel of Death (Bava Basra 17a; Rabbeinu Bachye). The Talmud describes this as the most exalted form of death, likening it to pulling a hair from milk; that is, the soul departs from the body with no resistance (Berachos 8a). R’ Tzadok HaKohen explains that to the extent that people sin in life and establish a bond between their soul and the pleasures of this world, it becomes increasingly difficult for them to part from physical life. For these people, our chachamim describe, death is like “pulling embedded thistles from sheep’s wool,” as their soul battles to stay connected to the body.

Chapter 20 begins with “The Children of Israel... arrived at the Wilderness of Zin in the first month and the people settled in Kadesh. Miriam died there (דש) and she was buried there (דש)” (Bamidbar 20:1). Rashi explains the seemingly superfluous double-usage of the word sham to suggest that Miriam, like her brother Aharon, also died through a Divine kiss, as the pasuk states, “Moshe divested Aharon of his garments and dressed Elazar his son in them; then Aharon died there (דש) on top of the mountain” (ibid. 20:28). Rashi states: “The two identical words teach us that there was a similarity between the deaths of Aharon and Miriam; just as Aharon died through a kiss, so too did Miriam.” According to the text of other editions of the Talmud, the comparison is to the death of Moshe, in the context of which the word דש also appears (see Devarim 34:5).

This explains why Elazar, who upon the passing of his father and his subsequent role as Kohen Gadol, was permitted to be present at Aharon’s death. Because Aharon died by misas neshika, and the Angel of Death was not present, Elazar did not become tamei from the meis, and did not transgress the prohibition that states, “He [the Kohen Gadol] shall not come near any dead person; he shall not contaminate himself to his father or his mother” (Vayikra 21:11). When he died, Aharon’s neshamah left his body without a trace of tumah left behind.

Rashi asks, “Why is the passage of Miriam’s death juxtaposed with the passage of the red cow? To tell you, just as offerings atone, so too does the death of the righteous atone” (Rashi to 20:1). The laws of the red cow were originally introduced to Klal Yisroel during their second year in the wilderness, on the day that the Mishkan was erected (Gittin 60a), while Miriam died in the fortieth year. That is why the question is raised: Why are the two passages, which reflect times that are so far apart, placed side by side? (Mizrachi; Sifsei Chachamim). Upon her death, the well that had followed the Bnei Yisroel through the midbar providing water suddenly disappeared. The Midrash states that Hashem caused the well to disappear so the people would realize that their well of water had been supplied in Miriam’s merit. Thus appreciating her greatness, they would mourn this tzaddeikes in a befitting manner.

Unfortunately, Miriam’s death and the loss of the well led to yet another national tragedy, as the lack of water caused the people to once again rebel against Moshe and Aharon. Angered by their complaints, Moshe struck the rock with his staff, resulting in Hashem’s refusal to allow Moshe or Aharon entry into the Land. A few short months later, Aharon passed away in a cave on Mount Hor. After Aharon's death, klal Yisroel resumed its journey to the Land, which had been interrupted by the period of mourning. Just as Miriam's greatness was fully perceived after her death, for it was then that the people realized that their water was provided in her merit, so too did Aharon's greatness gain a new dimension after his passing, for the Sages (Rosh Hashana 3a) teach that after he died, the pillar of cloud which had guided and protected them, had left the nation. Seeing this and assuming that klal Yisroel was now vulnerable, the Canaanite king of Arad launched a foray against them (Artscroll Stone Chumash).

The Midrash identifies six tzaddikim to whom the Angel of Death was powerless to remove their souls upon their death: Avraham, Yitzchok, Yaakov, Moshe, Aharon and Miriam. All six of these outstanding and prominent leaders in Jewish history departed from this world by misas neshika, a Divine kiss, leaving their souls immortalized and their memory eternal. In their zechus, may Hashem bring Moshiach to klal Yisroel, speedily and in our days. A gutten Shabbos.
